TRADITIONAL THAI MASSAGE FROM OASI THAI

According to legend, it was Jivaka Kumar Baccha, friend of the Buddha and physician of the Sangha (the Buddhist monastic order), who created the traditional Thai massage, 2500 years ago. In Thailand, Buddhism arrived 2000 years ago and massage, seen in its spiritual dimension, was long handed down and practised in Buddhist temples. Today it is considered part of traditional medicine and is widely used for therapeutic purposes.

Our body is crossed and surrounded by thousands of energy lines (72,000) through which vital energy flows. The Thai massage, working on the body, goes to act on the ten main energy lines (called "sen"). It is not only the hands, but also the feet, elbows and knees that manipulate the body with pressures, stretching, torsions, according to a rhythmic and fluid procedure, without haste: almost a ritual, listening to each other.

The massage restores the balance of energy lines, dissolves their blocks and releases the flow of vital energy. Energy blockages, as we well know, are caused by stress, frustrations, conditioning, repressed behaviours, which we accumulate day after day, year after year... And that's why the well-being given by Thai massage is not only physical, but also inner, much deeper.

The traditional Thai massage gives inner well-being to both those who give it and those who receive it. The one who does the massage enters into deep harmony with those who receive it and "feel" it together with him. It expresses in contact a feeling comparable to that of the mother towards the child, called "Metta" or "loving kindness". Each massage is a unique and different experience, almost like artistic creation. The one who receives the massage renounces control, abandons himself to the hands of the other and, through those hands that shape him, rediscovers his body. And in this way he finds himself, in harmony with the other and with "everything".
